THURSDAY, DEC. 20, 1860.

—We suppose that all or nearly all the various schemes and methods devised for the protection of the country are now made public.

The measure introduced in the Senate on the 10th inst. by Mr. Crittenden must well nigh if not entirely exhaust the catalogue.

The evils and the remedies proposed for it are fully before the country.

The next step on the part of the friends of the Union at Washington is to determine which one of these remedies what remedy, or combination of remedies, will be adopted.

The task of determining the best combination in the first instance devolves on the Committee of Thirteen in the Senate, and on the Committee of Thirty-three in the House. We in common with every other patriot in the Union look to the action of these Committees with very deep anxiety.

—The next step is the local one of the method of purification that we can devise most suitable and effectual.

We have staved the method distinctly, and unfolded it in length. We have passed it with earnestness. Having done this, having discharged frankly what we conceived to be our duty in the matter, we are now to consider what and the method of purification of the sentiments at Washington, and, without surprise, regard to the method we prefer, co-operate faithfully in the execution of any reasonable measure of peace that the conservative Senators may representatives of the South to us.

Having done this, that we can do.
